The India I know and love!
cc – @narendramodi 🙏

Minister (PM) of India in 2014. So, this sort of longevity in a vibrant democracy is extraordinary.

I have spent a big part of my adult life coming to India to play cricket and travel. I have met extraordinary people and made friends here. Despite being an outsider, I have watched India change from close quarters.

What strikes me most today is the confidence palpable everywhere in the country — a cheerful self-belief in its own destiny.

When I first came to India, there was a particular kind of diffidence, which almost felt like there was not enough realisation of its own potential. Today, there is a different feeling. Indians today think bigger and compete harder. They expect more from themselves and from their country.

I have seen this very clearly in sport.

Take Indian cricket, for example. When I first arrived in India, there were wonderful players and huge passion. But a lot of India's success hinged on a small group of extremely talented superstars.

Today, the depth of Indian teams is extraordinary. A team sitting on the sidelines can beat the best in the world. Young players arrive with a belief that they belong at the highest level. The standards around fitness, preparation and professionalism have changed enormously.

While the men's team has always been formidable, it is particularly gratifying to see how far women's cricket in India has come. India is a cricketing powerhouse, so when women's cricket grows and succeeds here, its impact is felt far beyond India. It raises the profile of women's cricket around the world.

I have also watched Indian athletes across athletics, shooting, wrestling, boxing, badminton, hockey, tennis and other sports increasingly making a mark all over the world. Indian names appear on podiums and in finals in sports where they were much less familiar. This is another sign of how much India's landing and, of course, digital payments. The way people use technology here is amazing.

India has also become much more comfortable thinking big. I think about Gujarat, in particular. It is home to the world's largest cricket stadium and the world's tallest statue. You don't build things on that scale by thinking small. Whatever one thinks of PM Modi politically, there is clearly an instinct in him to think in terms of scale and possibility.

I have seen that same instinct in the way India talks about its place in the world. India wants to lead, compete, build, innovate and have its voice heard.

Nature is particularly close to my heart. I have spent time in Kaziranga and am passionate about rhino conservation. I have seen the work being done to protect India's wildlife, and it is something that I admire enormously. The return of the cheetah caught the imagination of the whole country. I have also learnt about the conservation of the rare Asiatic lions of Gujarat.

When I met Modi, his enthusiasm for wildlife was obvious. We spoke passionately about the release of cheetahs and I could see how excited he was by it. He has also helped establish the International Big Cat Alliance, with India taking a leadership role in bringing countries together around the conservation of big cats.

That is something I find fascinating about India today — pursuing rapid economic and industrial growth while being deeply invested in protecting animals and preserving its natural heritage.

In 2022, after receiving a wonderful letter from PM Modi, I posted on social media that since stepping into India in 2003, I had grown more in love with the country on every visit. When I was asked what I liked most about India, my answer was easy: the people. The people are still the reason I keep coming back.
